

Protection of Children and Young People

If you are a child or young person, you are entitled to special protection while using the internet. You have the right to have content which compromises your dignity, security, privacy, or future reputation or interests deleted in a short period of time. You are also afforded special protections with regards to physical, mental, and moral welfare, such as regarding sexual exploitation and abuse.

Right to Effective remedies for violations of human rights

Individuals have the right to an effective remedy when human rights are restricted or violated. This remedy should not necessarily resort to immediate legal action, and it should be accessible and affordable. National authorities are obligated to protect internet users from criminal activity committed on or using the internet. Internet service providers, online content providers, and other companies and public authorities should also provide easily accessible information about rights and possible remedies. The right to a fair trial within a reasonable period of time by an independent and impartial court extends to charges of criminal offenses committed online.

Freedom of assembly, association and participation

You have the freedom to peacefully assemble and associate, participate in civil society, and join trade unions online. You may also protest peacefully online, with the acknowledgement that blocking or disrupting service or causing property damage are not protected and are subject to legal consequences

Access and non-discrimination

Accessing to the internet enables free exercise of human rights. Except in the case of a court decision, you should not be disconnected from the internet against your will. Access should also be affordable and non-discriminatory

Privacy and Data Protection

You have the right to privacy and a family life online, including but not limited to protection of personal data and respect for confidentiality. Personal data may only be processed or transferred to third parties with your informed consent. General surveillance or interception is not permitted, except in exceptional circumstances as prescribed by law, such as a criminal investigation.

Education and Literacy

You have the right to privacy and a family life online, including but not limited to protection of personal data and respect for confidentiality. Personal data may only be processed or transferred to third parties with your informed consent. General surveillance or interception is not permitted, except in exceptional circumstances as prescribed by law, such as a criminal investigation.

Freedom of expressions and information

You are free to express yourself and access information online. The freedom to express and access information and opinions extends to those which may offend, shock, or disturb others as long as they do not incite discrimination, hatred, or violence. Public authorities must respect and protect this right, and any restrictions must pursue a legitimate aim in accordance with the European Convention on Human Rights. You may choose not to reveal your identity online with the acknowledgement that national authorities may take measures which may reveal your identity.
